FishingMatters Relaunches Cox & Rawle Brand...

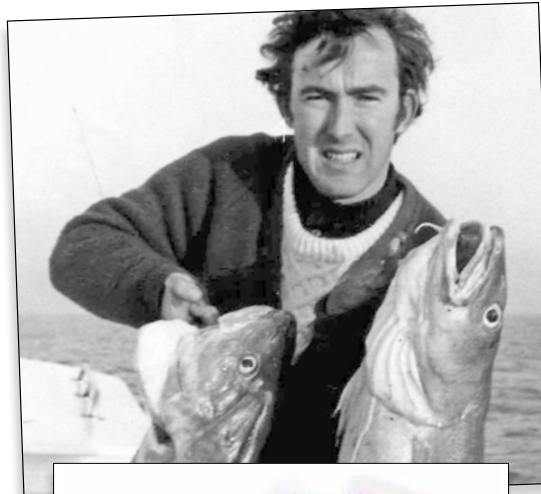

As Bob Cox retires he celebrates the relaunch and innovation of the Cox and Rawle brand by FishingMatters.

It's hard to remember now, forty years on but when John Rawle and I first discovered the benefits of casting baits away from the boat and went on to develop Up-Tiding, that the average UK boat angler used 30 to 50lb breaking strain line and used a 2m long boat rod to suit.

On the other end of the line was either a brass wire 3 hook paternoster or crude wire lead clip, both were held on the sea bed by the use of a 250g pot lead. In those days hooks were taken out of the packet blunt and sharpened or not by the angler.

Things had to change! Cox and Rawle were born.

In order to use the lighter lines and sinkers that Up-Tiding required we set about developing tackle fit for the new way of fishing. Sharp hooks from Partridge of Redditch in a range of patterns that Up-Tiding demanded were introduced in 1983. Lightweight terminal booms made from super strong thermo plastics soon followed, these were developed with our injection moulding partners and were often copied never bettered. Later ready tied rigs, not available at the time were developed on a species by species basis that suited the new method.

With retirement coming and a desire to travel and fish more, FishingMatters' offer to take over the company was well timed, giving the best of both worlds, a continuing interest in tackle development but more important for me, time to test and use the tackle that the future will bring.

Bob Cox, Tillingham, Essex

In recent years materials and production methods have changed radically so it should come as no surprise that Cox & Rawle too are ringing the changes and as part of our re-branding have taken the opportunity to re-visit our range and products. You will see classic patterns being improved with micro-barbs, sharper points, different finishes and improved performance. Rigs will be made from the latest high quality materials, tied in England to be better than ever. Hooks will be improved and the range extended to include circle hooks and some of the latest patterns down to sizes to offer the finesse that will make even the match anglers realize something changed!
